excerpt from manual training magazine vol 14 now wherein have present day methods improved upon those of the past unquestionably in many different directions it has long since been recognized that the past dry skeletal method of analytical drawing was pedagogically incorrect not to say unsatisfying and uninspiring the child asked for bread and he was given a stone lvianual dexterity at all cost was formerly the primary aim esthetic insight languished nature the child s birthright was a stranger in the school room it was a thing apart to be enjoyed only out of school hours providing any time at all could be found for it if we have done nothing else in our present day work we have conferred a boon upon the child in bringing so much of nature into the school room and basing our study upon nature instead of the abstractions of geometry 5k we owe it to the children whose destinies are in a measure in our hands to the parents who deliver them into our keeping to the school boards that pay us for our leadership and what we do not sufficiently think about to the community that the united efforts of all of us living within its bounds are striving to develop to see to it that the course in drawing shall meet every demand that the needs of the present day may lay upon it and to purge it of every adventitious exercise that may rob
