streets bridges and waterways of these significant sensuous cities to reveal the ambitious schemes undertaken to promote the cleanliness and health of their communities along the way we encounter a broad and fascinating cross section of renaissance society from courtesans to street food sellers and architects to canal diggers and using new archival sources uncover both the ideals and lived experiences of health and environmental management during the renaissance vital connections were believed to exist between people's natures and those of the places they inhabited problems in urban or environmental bodies could have social and moral as well as physical effects street cleaning or the dredging of canals therefore were often justified in societal and religious as well as natural terms these associations shaped government measures to regulate everyday life in ports alongside communal responses to natural disasters they informed the management of the environment including waste disposal flood defences dredging and land reclamation and endowed such activity with both physical and symbolic purpose this is not simply a story of elite official initiatives members of communities used public health structures to resolve the challenges of urban life social and physical occupational groups such as fishermen acted as environmental experts through the organisation of their guilds and provided reports on specific projects and proposals to government magistracies finally the governments of both ports operated important systems of petitions and privileges which encouraged innovation and the development of new technology by citizens and foreigners to address the central environmental challenges of the day renaissance public health then emerges as a collaborate
