immune system per se sure there are defenses inside the body which maintain health but there is no mechanism that makes a person immune to disease for instance you cannot catch type ii diabetes from anyone but you can get it if your cortisol levels are high for years from stress and your adrenals are exhausted from being in fight or flight constantly triggering an excess of glucose into the bloodstream and when a person sits in a chair watching movies instead of physically fighting or fleeing the glucose pours into the bloodstream and the lack of physical movement drains the body of insulin as it attempts to clear out the excess glucose the result is type ii diabetes no contagion necessary and no immunity possible when a person adopts a lifestyle like this in a sick environment and does one catch type ii diabetes from a virus no of course not it is a body in a sick environment with a sick lifestyle response that brings the disease though it may seem clear how this works in the case of type ii diabetes the same could be said for any disease there human body has a detoxification system which includes exosomes as well as other mechanisms cell repair of injured cells can be accomplished by either regeneration of the parenchymal cells or repair and replacement by the stromal connective tissue new research shows that some previously overlooked molecules in the body's cells play a key role in the repair of damaged dna the neglected molecule is called histone 1 h1 and has so far mainly been described as a molecule that helps to organize dna within cells and so again there is no such thing as a contagious disease nor is there such a thing as an immune system per se there is no mechanism that makes a person immune to disease other than good healthy lifestyle and healthy environment the phantom menace is the lie that some invasive viral enemy is out there trying to kill you it is not and those propagating this lie in order to terrorize the world and therefore bring it under their submission are responsible for the greatest crime against humanity ever perpetrated relive all of the excitement of star wars episode i the phantom menace in this illustrated storybook and cd set
