a political essay about canadian government style and a call for a new type of conservative leadership crowley claims that canadian politicians need to be less of a designer top down pronouncements and more of a gardener working from the bottom up cultivating instead of engineering having divided thinkers about society into these two large categories crowley tells us that the designers believe that they have sufficient knowledge or data to bring about precisely the end that they desire or at least that they say that they desire though their drive to power should never be underestimated without any deleterious unintended consequences whereas the gardeners are more modest and are content to work with what already exists especially where whatever already exists has virtues or beauties this is not a call to inaction or passivity gardeners have a profound influence on the gardens that they cultivate but they do not fall prey to the delusion that they can create anything they like irrespective of the climate soil nature of the plants available etc
